Novacab in Vehicles (Novacab)

The technology provides for thermal storage that is charged directly by coolant flow rate; simply put, electricity is created from the flow of heat in the cooling system of vehicles. This electricity is stored in a modular unit in the vehicle and will supply air conditioning and heating needs for 6 to 10 consecutive hours without running the engine. It is a natural solution for long distance trucks with sleeper cabs.

This patent and technology targets 500,000 Class 8 trucks with sleeper cabs out of a fleet of 2,400,000 Class 8 trucks in the USA and Canada. This technology also applies to 240,000 new vehicles of Class 8 with sleeper cabins built every year in North America.

This technology allows for a reduction in yearly fuel consumption between 6,000 to 8,000 liters per truck.

There are 2 other major advantages. There is a reduction of co2 and other gas emissions. This technology can prolong the engine's useful life between 200,000 km to 300,000 km.

Testing and installations have been made with outstanding results which were monitored and validated by independent sources such as Transport Canada, Hydro-Quebec, etc. Transport Canada's tests showed that the Novacab TES integrated climate control system has significant advantages compared to present trucking practices.

Currently 22 states in the USA and half of the Canadian provinces have recently passed legislation forbidding idling truck engines when stopped anywhere especially at truck stops.

Thermal Energy System for stationary applications (Novacab TES/S) also applies.
